AMERICAN HISTORY: Eighteenth Century Conflicts, in Europe Affect North America, Read, listen and learn English ...

This week in our series we tell about the conflicts among the nations in Europe during the 18th Century and how they affected North America.

During the 18th Century, Spain, France and Britain controlled land, in North America.

The powerful European nations already were fighting each other for control of territory and riches all over the world.

They were called King William's War, Queen Anne's War, King George's War and the French and Indian War.

The French and Indian War was fought to decide whether Britain or France would be the major power in North America.

France, its colonists and their Indian allies fought against Britain, its colonists and their Indian allies. French explorers had been the first Europeans in the areas around the Great Lakes and the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

The land along the East coast had become crowded, and settlers were moving West.

The Indian tribes might have been able to resist the people moving West if they had been united.

The British hurt the French traders' business when they bought fur from the Indians.

One of the French trading centers was built in the area where the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania is today.

This was the same George Washington who would later become the first President of the United States.

British troops under the command of General Edward Braddock joined George Washington at Fort Duquesne.

The British general expected to fight the way battles were fought in Europe.

One was Lake George.

These lakes provided the best way to move troops and supplies during the French and Indian War. The military force, which controlled the lakes and rivers, controlled much of North America. The British had bases along New York's Hudson River. The fort would control Lake Champlain and the area needed to reach the northern part of Lake George. The fort was designed to provide a strong defense against attack. His name was the Marquis de Montcalm. One of these was Fort William Henry on Lake George. But the Indian allies of the French did not honor the surrender agreement. In 1758, a strong British force attacked Fort Carillon on Lake Champlain. Fort Ticonderoga would also become important later, during America's war for independence. Few people who visit this calm and peaceful area stop to remember the terrible fighting that took place there 250 years ago.
