Welcome to ...
In this episode of Worldwide Gastropods, I will tell you something about these magnificent creatures Anthozoa, also known as flower animals. is a class within the phylum Cnidaria
Two well-known examples of Anthozoa are sea anemones and corals
Such as this Longnose Hawkfish, which lacks a swim bladder however, most corals form colonies of genetically identical polyps.
Some of the species also harbour a type of algae (dinoflagellates), in a symbiotic relationship.
Sea urchins, such as this Tripneustes gratilla, can often be found in coral reefs
a che dwelling anemone
The smaller inner tentacles are used for food ingestion.
All cnidarian species, such as this anemone, can feed by catching prey with nematocysts.
A nematocyst fires a structure that contains a toxin.
If you watch closely, you can see a clownfish hiding between its tentacles
Anemonefishes and sea anemones have a symbiotic, mutualistic relationship
These are Corallimorpharia, an order of marine cnidarians closely related to stony or reef building corals
